This course is philosophical in nature, so its not strictly limited to any national jurisdiction or system of law.

Previous knowledge

None specific. In general, knowledge of the structure of the Western Legal System.

Prerequisites

None specific. In general, knowledge of the structure of the Western Legal System.

Teaching methodology

The course will be divided into two main parts. The first will consist of learning about the three major ethical schools of thought in Western culture. The second will involve recognizing and exploring different ethical proposals within the professional legal field. To achieve this, the methodology will include lectures followed by readings that students must complete to deepen their understanding of the lessons taught.

Although our intention is to revisit and reexamine theoretical concepts throughout the course, some sessions can begin with a prior reading (whether conceptual or a case study). Our aim is not to overwhelm students with readings but to efficiently provide them with the elements of discussion necessary to better grasp the notions analyzed in class.

Materials will be provided to the students: not all of them shall consist of academic papers; the width of the matter of study (and the legal profession, for that matter) allows us to consult other sources such as videos, news or documentaries.

Discussion will be an integral part of the sessions, to identify: the ethical decision at stake; the moral foundation in which it stands on; and the nuances that every case may bring to the table.

Additionally, students will be faced upon two ethical dilemmas on two special sessions. From these, they will have to choose one of the dilemmas for an essay assignment.

Attendance and active student participation are crucial components of the course, and they will be reflected in the final grade. Students can miss up to two sessions without having to justify their absence. Any student missing three sessions or more has to expect a significant reduction in their final grade.

Description

Course contribution to program

Legal professionals hold the privilege of being, not mere recipients, but gears of the functioning of the legal system. One may say that they have a very particular impact on the economic, political, and constitutional life of a country. The interpretation, the concretion or the bending of the Law have direct influence on the expression of our legal rights and duties. This specific position asks from legal professionals to adhere to a set of rules that should bind them when acting as agents of the law. This course aims to teach our students not as much as to be ethical, but to be conscious decisionmakers
